Although we live in a peaceful community, there is always wars and conflicts taking place in other side of the world. Refugees escaped from these war zone, and they often suffer isolation and helplessness in a new community. To address this issue, UNHCR launched its 'Lego Refugee Awareness Campaign' in 1995. Aiming for raising awareness of supporting refugees, the campaign mainly targets audience from wide public. Through ~~or~~ ^{the use} of ~~a~~ powerful lego-style image ^{with} emotional and evocative language, the ~~ex~~ campaign poster effectively persuades the audience to support the UNHCR.

Through visual, the author draws attention and give strong emotional impact. First, ~~we will~~ ^{this essay} will analyze the visual. The poster utilizes lego-style characters. This deliberate style choice draws attention from public cleverly, as lego's vibrant color is highly visible and ~~especially~~ is well-known by the public. This familiarity ^{builds} ~~connect~~ closer connection between audience and author, making the ^{readers} ~~poster~~ more easily accept the ideas. ~~Furthermore~~ Apart from style, the juxtaposition is employed by the author to create dramatic tension.

The space contrast between the community ~~members~~ and the isolated refugee, ^{where} extremely crowded _{space} versus spacious one, illustrates the ^{isolation} ~~refugees~~ _{physical} may face in a new community. Furthermore, the contrast between their interaction is notable. The community members actively ~~talk~~ communicate with others in friendly body language, while they turn their back to the refugee. This demonstrates the mental isolation of refugees. Together, by showing the physical and mental isolation via juxtaposition, the author effectively lets ^{hinting ~~prompting~~ them to support the refugees in their community,} audience to share ^{lonely} feeling with refugee. To reinforce the isolation, employment of high angle perspective and contrast of facial expression further amplifies ^{contrast and} space isolation ~~and~~. Hence, through powerful visual, the author ~~ex~~ skillfully builds connection with audience and showcases isolation and loneliness of refugee in a new community, suggesting readers to seek solution, which is ^{to support} ~~UNHCR~~. ^{good}

In addition to visual elements, the author utilizes ^{evocative and} ~~sensational~~ yet professional language to make its implication even more powerful. By appealing to ethos, the author shapes its reliable personality to readers. By including statistics "50 million" refugee who received help by UNHCR, the author makes the readers easily capture the ^{its} strong power of organization and charity nature. The diction "restart" suggests the help is extraordinary, as it makes the refugee's life completely different. Through the statistics and strong diction, the author effectively demonstrates the breadth and depth of their help to refugees, making them ~~not~~ sound professional, effective, and persuasive to readers.

Apart from appealing to ethos, the text ~~gives~~ has great emotional impact as well. ^{It encourages the readers to think deeper into the refugee crisis and the feeling.} ~~The~~ The author applies storytelling to intrigue readers by illustrating a scene of warfare. ^{By using "How does it feel?" caption as rhetorical question, the author builds the bridge between text and visual.} ~~The word~~ By choosing powerful verbs, the author uses imagery to present the harsh sensory of a refugee. "Enemies" "Prowl." "burn", "shatter", "silence" create ~~terror~~ atmosphere of terror altogether, which ~~with~~ effectively ~~also~~ makes the readers to share the same terror with refugees. This naturally hints the readers to offer help to refugees who suffered fear and terror. Furthermore, the author presents the ~~sit~~ situation of having nothing when refugees join a community. "It's all they will ever have unless we help". By using the first perspective, "we", the author is able to powerfully ^{convey} ~~give~~ ~~give~~ a sense of responsibility to readers, for a collaboration of efforts. Therefore, by appeal to pathos, the author puts the readers into the same shoe of refugees and encourage them to help refugees through responsibility.

With pathos and ethos steadily built, the author finally called for people's action. By giving practical instruction of "show ~~me~~ smile" "not your back", the readers are able to ~~partake~~ take these action into practice, which ^{author's} achieves the purpose of supporting refugees. Adding to instruction, the author included the resources of the website of UNHCR. This share of ~~re~~information further encourage reader to visit the website and support the organisation.

To conclude, ~~the~~ the author skillfully combine visual and text to persuade readers to assist UNHCR. The visual captures readers' attention, ~~while~~ and showcases the physical and mental isolation of refugees powerfully, while the text appeal to pathos and ethos of readers effectively and "called directly action to support UNHCR and refugees. ~~The~~ Through these devices, readers are moved and have the willingness to support UNHCR and raise awareness of refugee crisis.

WHAT IF THE ATTENTION CRISIS IS ALL A DISTRACTION?

From the pianoforte¹ to the smartphone, each wave of tech has sparked fears of brain rot. But the problem isn't our ability to focus—it's what we're focusing on. By Daniel Immerwahr (20 Jan 2025)

5 There are awards for the year's best films, but not for its best TikTok videos. That's too bad, since 2024 yielded several tiny masterpieces. For example, @notkenna's seven seconds of a dog made to look like it was flying on a broomstick with ridiculously low-cost effects. Such Internet gems are what poet Patricia Lockwood calls "the sapphires of the instant"; each catching the light in a strange, hypnotic way. Just don't stare too long.

10 If every video is a starburst of expression, an extended TikTok session is fireworks in your face for hours. That can't be healthy, can it? In 2010, technology writer Nicholas Carr wrote "the Net seems to be chipping away my capacity for concentration and contemplation."

15 But are these concerns really all that new? I'm fond of an 1843 essay by Nathaniel Hawthorne warning of the arrival of a technology so powerful that those born after it will lose the capacity for mature conversation. His worry? The replacement of the open fire by the iron stove². History is littered with lamentations about distraction. Such questions came up in the 18th century with the rise of a disruptive new commodity: the novel. And yet today's critics deplore our inability to get through long novels that were once widely regarded as intellectual junk food.

25 By the 19th century, some had grown wary of intense concentration demanded by industrial life demanded. Psychiatrist Esquirol introduced a new diagnosis, "monomania," which was diagnosed with the same regularity that A.D.H.D. is today. He described it as a disorder of modernity. Herman Melville made it central to his novel "Moby Dick" in which Captain Ahab's fixation on a white whale brings ruin. Hypnosis, an intense form of focus, became an object of widespread concern.

35 Journalist Chris Hayes' 2025 book "The Siren's Call" recognizes the long history of panic. Some seem laughable in hindsight, like the 1950's concerns about comic books. Yet others seem prophetic, like early warnings about smoking. "Is the development of a global, ubiquitous, chronically connected social media world like comic books or cigarettes?"

Great question! Hayes asserts we should be gravely concerned. "We have a country full of megaphones, a crushing wall of sound, the swirling lights of a 24/7 casino blinking at us, all part of a system minutely engineered to take our attention away from us for profit," he writes. The case he makes is thoughtful, informed, and disquieting. But is it convincing?

Hayes argues that media organisations are retaining straying viewers with graphics, loud voices, quick topic changes, and titillating stories—it's like jangling keys to lure a dog. But cinema is going through an era characterised by unrestrained extravagance with award-winning films like "The Brutalist" exceeding three and a half hours. The average length of a Top Ten grossing film grew by more than twenty minutes between 1993 and 2023.

The same goes for narrative television. It was once entertainment for the inattentive; simple plots, broad jokes, interrupted by a tropical bird shouting about Froot Loops. With the introduction of streaming services writers stopped worrying about viewers losing the thread, their shows started resembling ultra-long films. Viewers responded by binge-watching.

And what about video games? Which have grown mercilessly long. Alex Ross described Richard Wagner's four-cycle opera "Ring of Nibelung" spanning fifteen hours as "the most ambitious work of art ever attempted, unlikely to have future rivals." In 2023, "Baldur's Gate 3" swept the video-game awards with a Wagnerian affair featuring rival gods, magic rings and enchanted swords that can take seventy-five hours, which sold fifteen million copies.

Even the supposedly attention-pulverizing TikTok deserves another look. TikTok is participatory: the platform excels not in slick content but in amateur enthusiasm taking the form of trends with endless variations. TikTokers spend hours preparing elaborate dance moves, costume changes, makeup looks and lip synchs. Any argument that people are becoming distracted must deal with the fact that many spend hours staring intently at their screens. What is doomscrolling if not avid reading? If people are failing to focus in some places, they're clearly succeeding in others.

If people aren't losing focus, what's the panic about? Complaints about distraction are most audible from the knowledge class—journalists, artists, novelists, professors. Such people must be creative in long, unsupervised stretches—they are particularly vulnerable to online interruptions. The knowledge-class problem is that cultural creators fear that smartphones will lure audiences away. They don't seem different from eighteenth-century priests decrying novels. Is the crisis of attention a crisis of authority? Is "People aren't paying attention" just a dressed-up version of "People aren't paying attention to me"?

The nightmare of alarmists of a TikTok-addled screenager isn't a full picture of the present, and it might not reveal much about the future either. Ours is an era of obsession as much as distraction, of long forms as much as short ones, of zeal as much as indifference. To ascribe our woes to a society-wide attention-deficit disorder is to make the wrong diagnosis. Which is unfortunate, because our relationships to our smartphones are not healthy.

HOW DOES IT FEEL?

Imagine this.
You've lived all your life at peace.
Home, family, friends, all normal. Then,
without warning, your whole world
changes.

Overnight, lifelong neighbours become lifelong enemies. Tanks prow the streets and buses burn. Mortar shells shatter the mosques. Rockets silence the church bells.

Suddenly everything you've known and owned and loved is gone and, if you are lucky enough to survive, you find yourself alone and bewildered in a foreign land. You are a refugee.

How does it feel?

The fact is, refugees are like you and me, except that they have nothing left but their courage, and with it the hope of once more being contributing members of society. It's all they will ever have unless we help.

So when you do meet a refugee,
imagine for a moment what it must be like, and then show her your smile. Not your back.
It may not seem much. But to a refugee it can mean everything.

UNHCR is a humanitarian organization funded by voluntary contributions. During its lifetime, the agency has helped more than 50 million people restart their lives.
